

love in metaphors

i think i love him

i love him with a kind of tenderness that feels like its been growing roots inside my chest, curling itself around every passing hour of my day just enough to remind me that he exists in the corners of mind which i don't have control over yet, while pretending to be busy in the eyes of the world. i love him so strongly that the universe itself pulls the most ordinary moments to me as if everything is soaked in his memory and is a sense of belonging. every flip of a page, a peek out of the window, pen twirling is a performance i put on while the voices in my head whispers his name.

i love him in the way warmth travels through my body in freezing winters on the second i hear his extremely calming voice on my phone, the kind of warmth that feels like someone has placed a tiny lamp inside my ribs, with a glow which refuses to fade even on the days i feel hollow inside. i love him the way my fingers pause on the screen, hovering over his picture, because looking at that familiar brown eyed face always felt like a door opened to therapy, a place where all my scattered thoughts settle down to rest with a quiet sense of relief.

i love him the way sunlight slips into a room without asking, the way it fills every space even when the curtains are halfdrawn, the way it insists on entering soft and loyal, just like he enters my thoughts when i am pretending im not thinking about him. i love him with the kind of ache that doesn't hurt, a kind which just stretches inside, more like a river trying to understand the shape of its own banks, learning how deeply it can run without overflowing.

i love him in the small, unremarkable moments that somehow become so precious, and worth loving because of him. when I see something in a shop and think "this would look good on him," or when a random joke makes me smile and my first instinct is to save it for him, as if joy itself makes more sense when it is being his to laugh at. i love him with the hush of early morning thoughts, the ones that come before the world wakes up, when honesty is loudest and pretending is impossible.

i love him in the way my heart slows down in his presence, as if it trusts him more than it trusts me, as if it knows he is the only person who could walk in without knocking and still make everything feel orderly. i love him with the kind of longing that isn't desperate, just deeply patient, waiting for a train i know will arrive, even tho i don't see it YET.

i love him with a devotion that spills into the smallest details, the way i remember his laugh like a melody that is not leaving my head anytime soon, the way i replay conversations because each word feels like something i wanna hear again and again, something im still learning to name. i love him with the heaviness of unsent paragraphs, the ones i write and erase because my feelings come out too raw and maybe too much like the truth i am still learning how to say without hesitating.

i love him
